In zero point everything by Uri Aran at Sadie Coles HQ, a wide array of media and subjects coalesce, presenting a dynamic field of encounter. Drawing, painting, sculpture, collage, moving image and photography collide and retreat from one another, establishing an orbit of recurring motifs. It could be argued, however, that the central medium of Aran's practice is the exhibition itself, and its affective field as analogous to the page. The decisions Aran makes are akin to the rhythm, grammar, prosody and intonation of poetry. Physical points in space, like the structural arrangement of words on a page. Poetry is language's excess. It is language that cannot be only reduced to information, it has the capacity to destabilise deeply entrenched ideas and forms, around which dominant positions, and values can otherwise take hold.

For Aran, the kind of knowledge that might be produced by art, so frequently cited as its core tenet of value, is not only found in the singular object or artwork itself, but also in the way their relation to one another can produce the discursive, emotional and social dynamics that enable a subjective response. Each component may be imbued with an existing set of values and assumptions rooted in their function or historic/cultural context – a 'La-Z-Boy' armchair, tins of fish food, patterned porcelain, lace bows, floral print furnishings – but these values, whatever they infer, can be upturned and recoded through subtle manipulations in form and arrangement. Aran folds audiences into the field of relations, inscribing them into their own processes of knowledge production; their proximity, and relation to the works become just as erroneous, charged, infinite, contradictory, transitional and compassionate as the artists. This willful complexifying of the exhibition's terms, is not designed to alienate the viewer with a sense of critical distance. There is sincerity and vulnerability in this gesture that evokes and activates shared and individual elementary feelings rather than a revelation of any specific truism.

Aran's practice shares an affinity to the construction and delivery of language and leans into a poetic sensibility. As Roland Barthes claims in Writing Degree Zero (1953), all texts demand the reader and writer have equal stakes in their exchange, posing that how a text is written is as important to the kind of knowledge produced, and what the text says. A text that attempts neutrality, or a 'zero degree' of style, is still a product of its form. As with writing, in Aran's exhibition no 'zero degree' exists in the coalescence of media. All relations are weighted, and it is in their organisation, dramaturgy and contextual staging that intuitive readings can be inspired in the viewer. In zero point everything Aran presents an experience that deals in affect rather than influence, emotion rather than deduction, conjunction of thought over connectivity of authorised ideas.

An artist punctuates and annotates a list, a letter, a children's story, a photo album or a family room. A poem gives way to a new meaning and shared ground – the creation of a new world in the very moment and conditions of its making. Poetry, much like zero point everything, slows down the functional capacity of language to explain, and in turn gives forth the conditions into which meaning can emerge. The attribution of meaning as a shared endeavour, as a site for the production of common ground.
